The chart gives each state's statute, when the transfer is a crime, the grade and penalty, and the prosecutions on record.

In most states, a fraudulent transfer is not a crime. A transfer made to defraud creditors can be undone in every state, and in twenty-five of them, Florida included, that is the end of it: the creditor gets the property back and the debtor faces no charge.

Sixteen states make the transfer itself a crime, and Massachusetts jails the debtor for it on a charge the creditor brings in a civil proceeding. Eight more states make it a crime only once an insolvency proceeding, such as a receivership, is pending or about to begin. Every one of these statutes requires the same intent a creditor proves in a civil case: intent to defraud, hinder, or delay creditors. A transfer without that intent is a crime nowhere, whenever it was made, so planning after a claim arises is lawful in every state.

The penalties range from a fine-only offense in Illinois to a felony, at least for some transfers, in Arkansas, Arizona, Alaska, and Ohio. Prosecutions are rare. Court decisions record charges in four states, Arkansas, Ohio, Alabama, and Massachusetts, plus one California prosecution from 1936, and every one whose facts are recorded was brought against the debtor, with a judgment or a levy already in hand. No state court decision records a prosecution of a lawyer.

These statutes punish the debtor who makes the transfer. A lawyer who helped is not the debtor, so the lawyer can be prosecuted only in two ways: under a statute that also punishes someone other than the debtor, or as an accomplice under the state's general accomplice law. Six states punish anyone who is a party to the conveyance, not only the debtor, and most of the statutes also reach a person who receives the property. A lawyer who only gave advice can be charged, if at all, as an accomplice, and most accomplice statutes require intent to promote the offense, not mere knowledge of it.

Federal law is the same in all fifty states once a bankruptcy is in view. Transferring or concealing a debtor's property in contemplation of a bankruptcy case is a federal crime under 18 U.S.C. § 152, and every conviction of a lawyer for a debtor's transfer has been federal. Each of those lawyers did more than advise: one drafted the deed and signed it as president of the debtor's corporation (United States v. Ledée, 1st Cir. 2014), one backdated stock certificates and drafted false schedules (United States v. Webster, 7th Cir. 1997), and one hid the money in her own trust account

(United States v. Kowalski, 7th Cir. 2024). The one prosecution built on advice and a trust account produced no conviction that stood (United States v. Knight, 8th Cir. 2015).

Whether a creditor can sue the lawyer for the transfer is a different question, answered state by state on the attorney liability page.
